Nourishing Families, Churches and Communities

DECEMBER 2008

LOTT CAREY BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSION CONVENTION • FOUNTAIN BAPTIST CHURCH

Project enables long-term, sustainable hurricane recovery

It was a turning point for the relief and recovery effort undertaken by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention and its partners in the Gulf Coast following hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Immediate services and a resurrection model had been in place for more than a year after the 2005 disasters. People's lives were being restored. But so much more needed to happen – and the money was running out.

The recovery plan also needed to shift to one with a more long-range scope. The plan required a focus on development, sustainability and ongoing nurture. A breakthrough was necessary.

That's when Fountain Baptist Church stepped in under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. J. Michael Sanders. Sanders formerly served as president of Lott Carey.

Located hundreds of miles away from the Gulf Coast in Summit, NJ, the congregation of Fountain Baptist donated $1 million to the cause. And, in the spirit of true sacrifice, the church came up with the money by putting its own building project on hold.

If you look at the Old Testament book of Nehemiah when the temple was destroyed, although Nehemiah was safe, he wept and mourned for those in the temple, said the Rev. Kenneth D. Cooper, minister to missions at Fountain Baptist Church.

With hurricanes Katrina and Rita, "it's the same thing," he said. "We have a connection to our brothers and sisters, and even though we were not directly affected, we were indirectly affected."

"We could hear their cry, we could feel their pain," Cooper said. "You have no other choice but to reach out and help."

The Fountain donation was earmarked to come in over a two-year period, yet the church gave it all in 18 months, said the Rev. Samuel C. Tolbert Jr., president of the Louisiana Home and Foreign Missions Baptist State Convention.

The convention partners with Lott Carey and the National Baptist Convention of America in the hurricane recovery effort. Also joining Lott Carey on the ground in Louisiana is the African-American Catholic Congregation Cathedral of the Lafayette Province, Imani Temple #49.

With that as the foundation, the Fountain Project was birthed. Designed under the goal of nourishing families, churches and communities, the project is providing a holistic approach to long-term hurricane recovery.

The project has provided for educational scholarships and job readiness training for hurricane evacuees and others affected by the storms, pastoral care consultations, and grants for innovative ministry efforts and community rebuilding, among other things.

"The Fountain Project has enabled us to bring resources directly to families (skills training and life skills training), churches (strategic coaching and ministry grants), and communities (sustainable community redevelopment support)," said the Rev. Dr. David Emmanuel Goatley, executive secretary-treasurer of Lott Carey. "When these core units of community are strong, life is more livable."

"Through this partnership, we have advanced our goal of touching people with the transforming love of Christ," he said. ■

Consultation ministers to ministers after Katrina and Rita

New Orleans area pastor Christopher Von Cockrell was so deeply depressed after hurricane Katrina that he would go days without eating.

Compounding that was the fact that his marriage had ended in divorce. "I suffered mental loss," he said.

Von Cockrell moved about an hour away to Baton Rouge, La., so he wouldn't have to face his congregants at Macedonia Baptist Church in Slidell. He only came to town to preach before retreating again.

"I wore a face" and was "constantly telling folks I was alright," he said. In reality, "I was in depression. I was mad. I was crazy."

Von Cockrell needed help, and he got it through a pastoral consultation provided by the Fountain Project.

The project – a ministry response to hurricanes Katrina and Rita – is being implemented in Louisiana by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention and its state partners. Funding comes from Fountain Baptist Church in Summit, NJ.

The Fountain Project seeks to nourish families, churches and communities through such things as job readiness training, grants for innovative ministries and initiatives to strengthen pastors and the people they serve.

The pastoral consultation began in May 2007 and brought together a core group of about 30 ministers for more than a year to support and care for each other and to focus on worship, nurture and mission via workshops, retreats and other activities.

Fountain Project pastoral consultation participants and others worship together during a service and grant awarding program.

"The ministers were real with each other. We were honest with our fears and our emotions," Von Cockrell said. "I was able to be healed in this process."

"I rededicated my life to Christ and I got re-baptized," he said. "This was truly life changing."

Each of the pastors received $10,000 grants through the Fountain Project to implement mission programs they designed to resurrect and transform lives (see page 3). Among the initiatives were efforts targeting young males, the launch of an intensive street witnessing ministry, and support of evangelism, education and health ministries in the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago.

"I was rejuvenated, refreshed and renewed," said Elder Bernard Waters with Book of Acts Ministry II in New Orleans. Because of the consultation, "I then understood that it (the hurricane crisis) was bigger than me." ■

Ministry opportunities abound at campground and retreat center

There are endless possibilities for ministry at a campground purchased through grants from the Fountain Project and slated to be operated by the Louisiana Home and Foreign Missions Baptist State Convention.

The 19.55-acre retreat center located in Grant Parish, La., was secured after 10 pastors pooled $10,000 grants they each received through the Fountain Project (see page 3). The property already includes dormitories, bath houses, office space and a house for an innkeeper.

Each of the pastors participated in a consultation conducted through the Fountain Project designed to support the Gulf Coast leaders and focus on worship and mission. The pastors all minister to bruised and battered congregations in a post-Hurricane Katrina environment.

The project was implemented by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention and its Louisiana partners, and funded by Fountain Baptist Church in Summit, NJ. Its primary goal is to nourish families, churches and communities after hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Fountain Pines Baptist Camp will, among other things, provide mission camps for youth, retreats for adults and leadership training for pastors and lay leaders. The retreat and camp center also will provide a safe base of operations for the convention in the midst of future hurricanes.

"We are getting a whole lot of mileage with Fountain dollars," said the Rev. Samuel C. Tolbert Jr., president of the Louisiana Home and Foreign Missions Baptist State Convention. ■

Funds provide job skills training, community development

Finding a job and a decent place to live is tough in the current economic recession. But try doing it as an evacuee from the costliest hurricane in U.S. history.

Those displaced from Hurricane Katrina, and subsequent Hurricane Rita, relocated to Louisiana communities like Lafayette and Lake Charles in 2005. Today they are still struggling to find affordable housing and gainful employment.

The task hasn't been easy given skyrocketing rent and housing costs and too few jobs to match people's skills. That's why the Fountain Project has made family empowerment and community development major priorities.

Efforts including job skills training and education assistance, as well as home building initiatives and infrastructure enhancements are part of the project implemented by the Lott Carey Baptist Foreign Mission Convention and its Louisiana partners. The project is funded by Fountain Baptist Church in Summit, NJ.

And, central to all the work is its faith-based foundation.

"We're here because God mandated us to be here. He has trained us for a season such as this."

— Bishop D. Taara Williams
Lafayette Restoration Center chief executive officer

"We're here because God mandated us to be here," said Bishop D. Taara Williams, chief executive officer of the Lafayette Restoration Center. "He has trained us for a season such as this."

The nonprofit restoration center is a ministry flowing from the African-American Catholic Congregation Cathedral of the Lafayette Province, Imani Temple #49. It has received funds through the Fountain Project.

One of the integral components of the restoration center's work is its employment readiness program. Clients learn such things as how to complete a job application, the proper communication during a job interview and cultural differences in the workplace.

A computer lab is available to program participants, and various procedures are addressed including the issue of substance abuse testing in order to qualify for a job.

"We found that it was hard for most people to qualify for jobs," said Courtney Ledet, the employment readiness coach for the restoration center. "We try to target those individuals to obtain certain skills."

The Fountain Project also is making strides in the area of community development.

In fact, the Louisiana Home and Foreign Missions Baptist State Convention, based in Lake Charles, recently bought eight acres of land in town to redevelop into single family homes. The convention also has received funds through the Fountain Project.

Through its B.J. Maxon Community Development Corporation, the Baptist convention plans to build 20 homes over the next two years for mid- to low-income people, and to provide home ownership training. Once the homes are built the focus will turn to housing for the elderly.

An employment readiness program client works on a home renovation project in the Lafayette, La., area.

There is public housing in the area, "but people want better, they want more and we want to offer them that," said Mary Bills, administrative assistant for the Fountain Project.

If the project can get them on a path, while also ministering to them spiritually, "then that's going to help them and their children," she said. Ultimately, "it's going to impact the whole community." ■
